1000 Kilometres of Climate Protest: Activists cycle from Gothenburg to Cologne

On August 7th the Cooperide team will leave Gothenburg (Sweden) by bike, bound to Cologne (Germany). Their destination is Ende Gelände, a non-violent action of civil disobedience against lignite use.

After the 2015 Paris Agreement on Climate Change, the activists demand action by politics and industry. That is: A shutdown of all coal plants.

"In Paris, all states committed to the importance of effectively combating climate change. But to reach the declared goal of 1.5°C global warming the coal has to stay in the ground", Hanna Burckhardt, Cooperide organiser, explains. "While the U.S. want to withdraw from the Paris Agreement, thousands of citizens will set an example - and nonviolently shut down Europe's largest carbon emitter. We bring the protest to the places where the future of the planet will actually be decided upon: into the Rhineland coal pits".

On their 1000 km ride the bike activists will stop in 14 Hamburg, Bremen, Osnabrück and Cologne in order to raise awareness to climate change in collaboration with local groups. In the past years, the Cooperide team has already organised a Tour Copenhagen-Paris (>1600 km) and a tour Malmö-Lusatia (>600 km).

Why Cycle?

The bicycle is an autonomous means of transportation free of CO2 emissions. But the aspiration of this project goes beyond that: Cooperide shows proof that alternatives are possible and that the commitment to a different lifestyle, one that requires a different pace, is serious. The Cooperide team bikes for 14 days as a performance of change. The Cooperide members show that it is possible to live life differently – and that this is desirable.

The ride starts on August 7th and will end at the Rhineland climate camp on August 21st. A daily route has been decided upon, biking an average of 70 km per day. In many cities the team is planning local activities.
